

POLITICAL ECOLOGY OF THE FAR RIGHT

From Latin America to Europe and the United States, the far right is moving forward. From institutions to social media, from the streets to the generation of new political parties, the neoconservative postulates adopt different shapes and make connections with environmental narratives and actions, from climate denialism and more aggressive anti-environmental groups to greenwashing and appropriation of certain aspects of environmentalism.

This issue of Ecología Política aims to encourage a critical analysis of the conservative turn and its relationship with environmentalism, considering theoretical, practical and political implications of this phenomenon. Furthermore, this issue goes beyond examining the socioenvironmental dimensions of far-right narratives and policies, in seeking to explore how social movements, peasants, indigenous peoples, feminists, environmental and land activist movements are taking a stance at the head of the socioenvironmental resistance against authoritarian neoliberalism, extreme right-wing threats and state repression.

Articles in this issue might include, among others, the following topics:

- | Socioenvironmental dimensions of conservative populism and authoritarian neoliberalism.
- | Environmental racism, eco-xenophobia and authoritarian neoliberalism.
- | Climate change denial.
- | Environmental narratives and practices of appropriation and cooptation.
- | Environmental history and political ecology of Fascism.
- | Nationalism and environmental colonialism.
- | Environmental activism and land activism against fascism, ecofascism and authoritarian neoliberalism.
- | Social movements, organizational dynamics confronting fascism and authoritarian neoliberalism: critical perspectives.

The issue will be published in June 2020.
